Before going to sleep, Dovid kisses the mezuza on his bedroom door, says the Shema, and then listens to his Mom sing him a good night song and comfort him with the thought that Hashem is always with him.

The shapes of various Jewish holiday objects and foods introduce very young children to circles, ovals, squares, rectangles, and triangles.

The miracle of the Chanukah oil, the significance of the latkes, the direction the candles are placed in the menorah and then lit, the definition of the shamash, a description of the dreidel game, the importance of family, and the lyrics to the song “Oh Chanukah!” are all included in this simple, twelve-page board book for toddlers.

Depicts a happy family picking apples, decorating New Year’s cards, getting ready for Temple, attending services, hearing the shofar, enjoying a round challah, blessing the wine, and wishing everyone a “L’Shanah Tovah!”

This photo essay, created in a Jewish nursery school, depicts children preparing for and celebrating Sukkot.

Loosely following the cumulative rhyme structure, the menorah is polished, the candles are placed, the blessings are recited, hand-made gifts are exchanged, relatives arrive, latkes are fried, the dreidel is spun, the story of Hanukkah is recited, songs are sung, and tzedakah is given.

As Blue, Joe, and their friends help Orange Kitten (who is presumably Jewish) celebrate Chanukah, they learn about the menorah, potato latkes, chocolate gelt, and the dreidel game, as well as two favorite Chanukah songs.

Francine Medoff’s 1983 edition now has new, color illustrations to tell the story of a mouse who observes wheat being harvested, ground into flour, mixed into dough, and baked into matzah.

Each page contains a letter of the alphabet along with rhyming text that corresponds with each letter; describes the symbols of the holidays as well as other concepts, objects, and food important in Judaism.

These editions, part of the Festival Time! Series, provide simple introductions to the customs of the Jewish holidays for young children who already have some knowledge.
